

than five hundred acres, for which he paid eight hundred dollars. Up to this time it had been called "the Powder Spring," the odor of the water, from the presence of sulphuretted hydrogen, being similar to that of water which had been used to wash out a gun. Now, that its use had grown into popular favor, Mr. Glenn enlarged his house, and opened a regular inn for the travelling public. He was a man much beloved by all who knew him, and finally the mineral spring took his name, and has ever since been definitely known as Glenn's Spring.

The capacity of his hotel did not at

Clipped By:

ottg

Sun, Jan 15, 2017