LAURENS, S. C., MARCH 27, 1912.

OLD INDIAN RELICS.

Flood Waters Near Waterloo. Unearth Many Old Arrows and Othes Relics of the Indian Days.

Waterloo, March 19.—Memory of the Red Man has thrust itself upon our notice in a particularly interesting manner in the recent find of some old relics which became exposed to view by the high waters of the last few days.

The bridge which expanded the Reedy river, has been washed away by the immense volumes of water which if possible, exceeded the freshet of 1908 and near the site where it stood and just partially visible (being on the outer edge of the water) an old indian mound of some height, has been washed intwain, spreading its contents to the observant eye of the curious. Arrows, accurately and beautifully chisselled from stone and flint-like pebbles, lie glistening in the sun, their razor-like ends showing only too plainly the deadly work which they accomplished when shot by the experienced hand of the savage in his lust for the blood of the white man.

Another object that we behold with almost too much horror to touch, is a tomahawk, also of granite and looking as if it had but just dropped from the hands of the chiseher.

Just think what an interesting bit of history these relics would make, could we but obtain it and how delighted we would be, could they but speak and give us their story.
